Upon hearing about the death of famed news commentator, Mike Wallace, in the news this week many people viewed this tragic passing as the end of an era. Mr. Wallace served as a commentator for most of his live up until his death at the age of 93, over which time many change have taken place. However, some would argue that the quality of journalism has been in a steady decline since long before Mr. Wallaces retirement. Internet bloggers have started to become popular within the last ten years the difference between bloggers and journalists, however, is that bloggers are not required to research. The Internet is often used for entertainment and not business reasons. He is clear that people are getting their news from sources like blogs and online social networking sites which do not meet high standards for quality. Some argue that just because Mr. Wallace has pass away does not mean that new journalists are not ready to take his place. Because the world has become increasingly technical and globalized, so the resources and training for new reporter will only serve to improve their skills.
